

AFC's Guide to Venting with Positive Purpose

When directed with purpose, venting can be a doorway to clarity instead of conflict. This guide provides healthy ways to express frustration without harming yourself, others, or the children who depend on your calm!

1

Acknowledge your feelings.

Co-parenting is complex and comes with lots of emotions, like frustration, confusion, anger, and sadness.

A healthy co-parent channels their feelings into:

- Writing instead of exploding
- Conversation instead of accusation
- Movement instead of withdrawal
- Creativity instead of destruction

These activities are signs of emotional self-control, a pillar of strong parenting.

2

Do an Emotional Checkup.

Watch your self-talk:

- Is this thought true or just loud?
- Am I predicting danger that isn't here?
- Am I assuming the worst instead of seeking clarity?

Look out for misunderstandings

- Parents with different histories, temperaments, and communications are more likely to clash. Avoid judgment and stay curious.

3

Create a Bridge by Listening.

Listening is not fixing or judging; it is presence. To listen well:

- Be steady
- Don't interrupt
- Don't escalate
- Reflect back what you hear
- Help the other person feel seen, not corrected

Remember: A child who watches two parents listen to each other learns how to listen to the world.

Venting with Positive Purpose

Start with reframing your vent session.

A positive vent session ends with breath, not fire. Instead of "I need to unload," try "I need help sorting through this."

This small shift creates direction. It keeps the conversation meaningful and turns venting into growth.

Example:

"I'm frustrated she changed the schedule again. I need to talk it through so I can respond calmly."
Outcome: boundaries set, emotions lowered.

Example:

"I feel overwhelmed today. I'm afraid I'm not enough."
Outcome: reassurance, grounding, perspective.

Example:

"I'm angry, but I don't want this anger to touch the kids."
Outcome: self-regulation, healthier choices.

Is venting always bad?

Nope. Venting becomes harmful only when it:

- repeats the same story with no movement
- attacks the co-parent
- becomes your only coping skill
- drags children into the emotional storm

Venting becomes useful when it:

- brings clarity
- lowers emotional intensity
- prepares you for healthier conversations
- reveals what you truly need
- helps you respond instead of react

Positive Parenting teaches that adults must regulate before they educate.
Venting helps you return to regulation.

Try These Techniques for Positive Coping!

- Walking or exercising
- Cleaning or organizing
- Deep breathing or prayer
- Art, music, or cooking
- Talking to a trusted peer
- Scheduled "parent resets" during transitions

Action for Children

614.224.0222
actionforchildren.org
1105 Schrock Rd., Suite 125,
Columbus OH 43219

